In contrast, all of the studies noted that survivors who experienced negative life events tended to be in worse health than survivors without negative life events. Previous studies have shown that depression and anxiety increase during the first year after diagnosis and are more common in women than in men \[[@B49]\]. We did not find a relationship between negative life events and depression or anxiety. This may be because there are no differences between men and women in the occurrence of negative life events. Because this is a cross-sectional study, causal inference cannot be made. This study had several limitations. First, the numbers were small. Thus, there may be a type II statistical error, in which a significant relationship is found for a nonsignificant hypothesis. Second, because this was a cross-sectional study, causality could not be determined. Third, the response rate was 46.7% and the participants included in this study were probably not representative of all breast cancer survivors. We were only able to confirm the sociodemographic and health information that was provided by the participants. Fourth, multiple questions were used to measure negative life events in the present study. In this case, if there are subjects who answered that they

Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a golf ball material for an aluminum core, and more particularly to a golf ball material for an aluminum core that is not only excellent in terms of flight performance of a golf ball but also is excellent in terms of durability. 2. Description of the Related Art A golf ball material for an aluminum core is a material that is in a solid-coated state, is not adhered to a core material, is not damaged during the formation of a coating layer, is not changed even in severe environment conditions, and is excellent in terms of flight performance and durability of a golf ball. Recently, a golf ball material for an aluminum core that is made of a polyurethane composition is proposed (For example, refer to Patent Documents 1 and 2). Further, a golf ball material for an aluminum core that is made of a polyurethane composite material that contains an epoxy resin is proposed (For example, refer to Patent Documents 3, 4 and 5). Moreover, a golf ball material for an aluminum core that is made of a polyurethane composite material obtained by reacting a polyisocyanate with a prepolymer obtained by reacting an isocyanate reactive polyol having active hydrogen with at least one kind of a chain extender is proposed (For example, refer to Patent Document 6). Still further, a golf ball material for an aluminum core that is made of a polyurethane composite material containing a polyurethane elastomer and a polyisocyanate or a prepolymer that is obtained by reacting an isocyanate reactive polyol having active hydrogen with at least one kind of a chain extender is proposed (For example, refer to Patent Document 7).
