Vitamin D and ageing: the role of vitamin D receptors. During ageing, various physiological and pathophysiological changes occur in the body. While such changes are inevitable, some of them can be accelerated with age. One of the factors that can be accelerated in the elderly, is the turnover of parathyroid hormone (PTH). PTH plays a key role in calcium homeostasis and bone metabolism, and it is regulated by vitamin D. It is thus tempting to speculate that vitamin D deficiency can accelerate various age-associated changes. Vitamin D has receptors, but this was initially associated with calcium homeostasis. However, the VDR has also been shown to play an important role in the regulation of the immune system. Because of its important role in calcium homeostasis, vitamin D deficiency can lead to bone loss, which increases the risk for fracture. Furthermore, because it is believed that the primary site of vitamin D production is the skin, vitamin D deficiency may not only be associated with decreased calcium absorption and bone loss, but also with increased susceptibility to infections, reduced immunological response, and possibly increased cancer incidence. Thus, vitamin D deficiency may also be associated with increased risk of cardiovascular diseases, autoimmune diseases, and cancer. Furthermore, many elderly patients are exposed to many drugs that can decrease vitamin D levels. This review examines the evidence for the role of vitamin D in different age-related changes.

Total arterial revascularization, on the other hand, has been reserved for the small subset of patients with total coronary occlusion, who are at high risk for either early or late death and/or disabling angina. This report describes our experience with total revascularization in 26 patients with multivessel coronary disease. Between December 1984 and
