several steps including L-arginine addition to the growth mix, addition of oxygen to the growth mix, and removal of nutrient additives. However, the increase in level of accumulation did not ameliorate production losses for the genetically modified strain BGSC2003 in the tested cultivation conditions. 60. The authors failed to provide a reasonably satisfying answer to the reviewer's questions related to the production process in Table 4{ref-type="table"}. Indeed, the use of nitrite in the pre-culture might very well induce the formation of a strain with more substantial over- expression of TEs. Finally, there is another aspect of genetic engineering that remains ignored by the authors: the evolution of vectors. The study by [B2] clearly shows that vector evolution under selective pressure is a very powerful method of recovering phenotypic characteristics from genetically modified crop plants. [B16] and [B8] have succeeded in recovering genes from plant genomes after evolution of the two vectors used in the present study. This method is generally highly selective, depending on factors such as the overall sequence length and the number of restriction sites; longer sequences have more sites as well as longer cohesive ends available, and therefore facilitate recovery of the entire inserted genomic fragment. The consequences

The present invention relates to the field of analog-to-digital converters (ADC's). The growing number of components in computer systems and the need for miniaturized systems has led to the use of ADCs of ever smaller size. For a given system, the ADC occupies the least amount of space in the system for a given performance level. To achieve a high performance ADC the number of components must be reduced, while maintaining ADC performance. Moreover, to achieve a reduced size ADC, the ADC must have a low power consumption. FIG. 1 shows a prior art fully differential single ended squaring ADC 100. ADC 100 includes a comparator 102 having a first differential input 104, a second differential input 106 and a single ended output 108. The single ended output 108 of comparator 102 is coupled to an input of a summer 110. The input to summer 110 may be coupled to a reference voltage (not shown) which is used as a reference to compare the signal at output 108 against the reference voltage. Summer 110 provides a squared output 112. The squared output of summer 110 is coupled to a low pass filter (not shown) which provides a feedback signal on input 114 to comparator 102. Input 114 to comparator 102 is coupled to a feedback loop (not shown) which includes the low pass filter. At high input voltages the open loop gain of comparator 102 will be large enough to overdrive the feedback loop causing the input to summer 110 to increase with time. The large open loop gain will cause the output of summer 110 to increase with time, which in turn increases the output of comparator 102. Since the output of comparator 102 is coupled to a positive input of summer 110, the increasing output of comparator 102 will also cause the positive input of summer 110 to increase with time, and the input to comparator 102 will remain below the reference voltage. At low input voltages, the open loop gain of comparator 102 will be small enough that the increase in the output of comparator 102 will not cause the input to summer 110 to increase with time. As a result, the input to comparator 102 will remain below the reference voltage, and the output of summer 110 will remain at a constant value. The closed loop bandwidth is determined by the time constant of the low pass filter coupled to the output of summer 110. This time constant is proportional to the capacitance of the capacitors used in the low pass filter. The fixed capacitance of the low pass filter prevents this ADC from being
