Containing the most extensive medical subject. Possible etiology of ganglioneuroblastomas of the adrenal gland. Intra-tumor hemorrhage has been demonstrated within adrenal ganglioneuroblastomas by computed tomography and angiography. Therefore, we performed a retrospective study of the records of two hundred and fifty-eight patients (mean age 33 years) with adrenal ganglioneuroblastomas to evaluate the possible etiological factors that might be responsible for this hemorrhage. Of the two hundred and fifty-eight patients, thirteen patients had severe anemia, all of whom developed the bleeding as a consequence of the adrenalectomy. In the other two hundred and forty-five patients, who were usually asymptomatic, the bleeding was probably secondary to trauma during either fine-needle aspiration of the tumor or to the operative procedure. Six of these patients had severe anemia as well. Our findings provide evidence that trauma is the most common etiology of bleeding in adrenal ganglioneuroblastomas. trial court's denial of his motion to suppress. Although the 3 appellant brings other arguments, the appeal is entirely based upon the denial of his motion to suppress. Initially, we note that the appellant pled guilty prior to the hearing on his motion to suppress. This Court has previously held: The State is entitled
